I had the surrender flying aloft, I ripple in the Indeed, but felt startled, a neat filling ash appeared, e anxious to tell rious points of and about the surrender field. He was from New York State, I soon discovered. I drove on and entered the section where North Carolina's state monument was erected to her brave dead. It stood neglected at the end of a narrow, muddy lane. From there to a small beauty spot of flowers and shrubs surrounding a few graves, among which gleamed a low white shaft. Stretching beyond lay the wide expanse of the surrender field surrounding the tiny, quaint village of old Appomattox. To the right by the side of the road stands the post office, a ragged beggar sunning, its paneless windows guarded still by hand-wrought bars of iron. I understood that the highway commission desired to tear away the dilapidated antiquity, but so far it had been saved from such ruthless modernism. The building is possibly over a hundred and fifty years of age. The old court house had fallen to decay and the debris removed, but the brick jail is still in fair condition. The most historic of all the buildings, the McLean house, is a pile of rotting timbers. It was torn down to be rebuilt at the Chicago Exposition, and for some reason left on its own grounds from that time to this.

My next stop was at a charming spot where a sign stated "Post Cards and Free Information." From the wide veranda of the old home, a cordial Virginian welcomed me. I entered the home to meet the ladies of the house. The paneled doors, many-paned windows, and antique furnishings were reminiscent of other days. I enjoyed a half hour filled with entertaining bits of information. Near this residence was a building of extreme interest and unusual charm, "The Tavern." The soft tones of the red brick had mellowed with the years. The narrow windows held the usual eighteen panes of glass. A wide fan arched over the doorway, from which the portico had been removed, leaving the trance on the walls. The side porches, too, had fallen down, the hand-hewn shingles had been replaced by a covering of tin. Four stories tall and graceful in proportion, it had seemed to express humiliation at its degredation and poverty. One must enter the once hospitable door, where men of rank and wealth had been greeted, over stone steps worn by countless feet. The date of the old tavern goes back one hundred and thirty-five years.

Before leaving this spot of sad memories, there was one gratifying bit of information gleaned. The State Conservation Commission of Virginia has voted to take over the surrender field in the State Park Area, and to acquire the land by purchase or gift as is possible. Virginia and the entire South, through its U.D.C. organizations, should put forth every energy possible to assist in preserving this field of Appomattox. The old buildings should be restored and refurnished."

Of course the State never acquired the "surrender grounds", leaving this action to the Federal Government. However, since this was completed in 1940, the village buildings (of 1865 vintage) have been restored, with two others reconstructed. Wouldn't authoress Hagy be pleased?
